Welcome to Des Moines, Iowa, host city of the MAC 2024 Annual Meeting. The conference theme this year is “Sowing Seeds of Change,” a nod to Iowa’s agricultural traditions and historic prairie ecosystem. It also acknowledges that archival work is evolving and changing, requiring archivists to adapt and implement new approaches to the work. Conference sessions and workshops will explore this theme and help you look at your work in a new light. The meeting will take place May 1–4, 2024, at the Downtown Des Moines Marriott in the heart of the city. Downtown Des Moines has enjoyed a resurgence of growth and vitality, and we encourage you to experience some of that energy.

TRANSPORTATION OPTIONS

Downtown Des Moines offers several ways of getting around town for attendees without vehicles.

DART BUS SERVICE

Bus service in Des Moines is provided by DART, the Des Moines Area Regional Transit Authority. Several local routes serve downtown Des Moines. However, be aware that many routes operate during rush hours only, and service is further limited on evenings and weekends. Single rides cost $1.75; day passes are $4.00. Pay with exact change or use the MyDART app to purchase mobile tickets. DART provides an interactive route map and a trip planner tool, and DART routes are integrated into both Google and Bing Maps applications.

D-LINE SHUTTLE

DART provides a free downtown shuttle (the D-Line), carrying customers between the Iowa State Capitol complex in the East Village neighborhood to the Western Gateway neighborhood near the Pappajohn Sculpture Park. The D-Line operates every 15 minutes from 6:30 am to 6:00 pm on weekdays and on Saturdays from 10:00 am to 5:00 pm.

DES MOINES BCYCLE BIKE SHARING

Des Moines BCycle is a world-class bike share system that features over 200 bikes at 27 stations across downtown Des Moines, available 24/7 from March to November. There is no better way to experience a neighborhood than on a bicycle! Rates start at $4 for the first hour and $3 for subsequent hours on a classic bike, with e-bikes priced at $19/$18 per hour. Reviewers recommend using the BCycle app for the easiest set-up experience.

SKYWALK

The conference hotel, the Downtown Des Moines Marriott, is connected to the Des Moines Skywalk on the second floor. The Skywalk, open from 6:00 am to 2:00 am, seven days a week, is an indoor walkway connecting more than 55 downtown restaurants, shopping centers, theaters, and transportation destinations. This amenity makes it easy to walk around downtown even when the weather isn’t great. Check out an interactive Skywalk map here.

Unlocking Midwestern Agricultural History through Archival Investigation

Farming practices in the Midwest have changed dramatically over the past century: mechanization of planting and harvesting of grain, consolidation of the meat-packing industry with its large-scale livestock raising and marketing, the introduction of monoculture and its single-crop fields expanding far and wide. These changes and more have contributed to an agricultural landscape that farmers of the nineteenth century—and before—couldn’t have foreseen.

Preserving the farming practices of earlier times by relying upon historical records and legacy plant seeds has taken on greater urgency in the face of these changes. In this plenary session, speakers representing organizations dedicated to such preservation will discuss their programs’ missions and the challenges they face. You will have an opportunity to ask questions following their presentations.

Speakers:
Jaime Nicolet Rutan
Jaime Nicolet Rutan (she/her) is the curator of collections, archives, and exhibits at Living History Farms in Urbandale, Iowa. A native Iowan, Rutan holds a bachelor’s degree in art history from the University of Iowa and a master’s degree in fine and decorative art from Sotheby’s Institute of Art.

Sara Straate
Sara Straate (she/her) is the seed historian at Seed Savers Exchange in Decorah, Iowa, a nonprofit organization that maintains and distributes a collection of over 20,000 varieties of heritage garden seeds and apples. Seed Savers Exchange promotes the importance of preserving biodiversity through seed stewardship and provides programming and other opportunities that engage gardeners, farmers, seed savers, and breeders with the collection.

Moderator:
David McCartney
David McCartney (he/him) is University of Iowa archivist emeritus and a past president of MAC. He has a bachelor’s degree in journalism from the University of Wisconsin–Madison and master’s degrees in history and library science, both from the University of Maryland at College Park. McCartney is a native of the northern Iowa town of Charles City, long considered the birthplace of the farm tractor.
I'm Rooting for You: Cultivating Relationships with Graduate Student Workers

The current GLAM hiring culture is competitive and increasingly experience driven—students are expected to graduate from their master’s programs with varied practical experiences in addition to theoretical knowledge and familiarity with best practices in the field. What opportunities exist for both full-time and part-time students to gain these experiences, and how can practitioners help without overextending themselves? What work goes into supervising and collaborating with students? In this roundtable discussion, panelists will examine the various aspects of collaborations between professionals and student workers in archives. Hear examples from archives professionals who make space for library and archives students to gain hands-on, project-based, educational experiences that benefit their own institutions, their partner organizations, and above all, the student participants. Learn about advocating for and acquiring funding for student positions and the types of projects students complete during internships and practicum experiences, and gain insight into how practical work experience supports and supplements classroom curricula. When strong relationships exist between universities and professional archivists, students can enter the field as well-rounded, confident professionals with the experiences and peer support systems necessary to secure full-time employment.

Speakers: Danielle Hall, Kansas State University (session chair) Nicole Connell, University of Illinois and the Urbana Free Library Sarah Lebovitz, Wayne State University Brandon Pieczko, Indiana University Donica Swann, Illinois State University Benna Vaughan, Baylor University

Session type: Roundtable, LIVE STREAM

Cultivating Success in Digital Soil: Navigating Open-Source Migrations

This session will discuss system migrations at four institutions: the University of Louisville, the University of Northern Iowa, the Loras College Center for Dubuque History, and Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art. The presenters’ institutions range from a large public university to a small private college to a large art museum. They all have migrated to the open-source systems ArchivesSpace or Samvera’s Hyku in recent years. In addition to the typical challenges faced during a migration, the presenters all had varying degrees of IT support and back-end technical knowledge. This led them to confront (and continue to confront) their own limitations with archival technology and to reach out to other communities for support. The presenters hope to help and show you that migrations can be successfully completed, even in instances with small staff and minimal resources, and in so doing encourage you in your own efforts to undertake this type of work. The presenters will discuss preparing for the migration, navigating the challenges, implementing the system, tools used, and what they would change about their workflows and processes.

Speakers: Tessa Wakefield, University of Northern Iowa (session chair) Emma Beck, University of Louisville Tara Laver, Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art Heidi Pettitt, Loras College

Session type: Panel
Cultivating Collaborative Partnerships Between a Campus and Its Community

Collaborative opportunities facilitate deeper understanding and more meaningful outcomes for archives and their communities. This presentation explores how archives at Bowling Green State University and Indiana University Northwest have worked with campus contacts, institutional offices, and community members to create impactful events and exhibits.

In 2019, the Bowling Green State University Libraries and Athletics Department formally partnered to preserve, provide access to, and further develop BGSU Athletics historical materials. At the heart of this partnership are the over 1,074 linear feet of the Cochrane Cunningham Archives and over 4,500 square feet of exhibit space to showcase BGSU Athletics’ history. As part of this collaboration, the BGSU Athletics Department requested that the University Libraries create an extensive BGSU women’s sports exhibit in celebration of Title IX. Presenters from BGSU will share how they collaborated with multiple archival collecting areas, campus offices, and former coaches/faculty to create an exhibit emphasizing the voices of female athletes and coaches, as well as laid the foundation for further BGSU women’s sports history collection development.

Indiana University Northwest Archives and the Office of Diversity, Equity, and Multicultural Affairs have partnered to support multiple programming initiatives using archival collections as a vehicle for establishing connections with the community. This cross-departmental collaboration has led to the creation of exhibits, discussions, and research incorporated into campus programming for Martin Luther King Jr. Day, Black History Month, Juneteenth, and Hispanic Heritage Month. Presenters from IUN will discuss the importance of creating meaningful engagement opportunities between a campus and its community by using archival resources to promote education, collaboration, and advocacy related to DEI.

Big Question, Little Questions: Born-Digital Excavation for the New Archivist in Town

This presentation will introduce the shared and varying challenges experienced by two early-career archivists working with born-digital materials during their first year in new positions. While the presenters’ respective public institutions seem disparate in the abstract (the University of Kentucky is a large PWI, while Chicago State University is a small institution that predominantly serves Black and brown students), their work shares the common mission of making born-digital collections discoverable and accessible to all in the hopes of eliminating historical gaps and cultivating new relationships within and beyond their communities. The means and methods of getting there, all those many tiny questions, are still evolving. This presentation will document the state of born-digital migration, arrangement, description, and access that the presenters found at the start of their appointments and present challenges and solutions they encountered through their first year, and it will lay out a roadmap for the work ahead, both in terms of technical challenges and their shared cultural and historical mission.

Tending the Untold: Contemporary Issues in Women’s Archives

This year marks the 10th anniversary of the landmark publication Perspectives on Women’s Archives. This roundtable discussion will provide updated perspectives from Midwest women’s archives on issues relevant to all repositories, seeking to sow seeds of inspiration and invention for a new generation of practitioners. The presenters will begin with brief remarks on the institutional histories of their collections, comparing and contrasting the missions and evolutions of three of the major women’s archives in the Midwest. The ensuing discussion will elicit a feminist perspective on several areas of archival practice, including donor relations, collections development and management, and outreach. For example, in discussing donor relations, the presenters will discuss topics like the disproportionate prevalence of imposter syndrome among women donors who do not feel worthy of archival preservation. In discussing collections development, the presenters will reflect on how even collections designed to address the underrepresentation of women in archives have perpetuated the absence of women of color, working-class women, disabled women, and other groups, and how they as practitioners have sought to acknowledge and repair that silencing through their archival work. In conclusion, the presenters will speak to the future of women’s archives, considering questions such as: How has the meaning of the exclusively “women’s space” changed with the advancement of trans liberation and resulting backlash? How will women’s collections be affected by recent laws targeting diversity, equity, and inclusion initiatives? And what do they see as the biggest challenges facing them in their work to preserve the history of midwestern women?

All Rise! Judicial Collections in the Archives

While many repositories hold the papers of federal, state, and local judges, judicial collections are an underexamined genre of archival materials. However, as a subset of public policy papers, judicial collections represent sites of encounter between the people and the state; as such, they have the potential to shed light on a host of interactions among various governments, communities, and cultures. In this session, the presenters explore the challenges and opportunities involved in processing and providing access to the papers of two judges who served on the US Circuit Courts of Appeal, the intermediate level of the federal judiciary right beneath the US Supreme Court. Curt Hanson will discuss the roles that both technology and related collections at other repositories played in the processing and reprocessing of the papers of Judge Myron Bright, whose collection consists of approximately 600 boxes that became open upon the judge’s passing in 2016. Anu Kasarabada will describe the ongoing processing of the Judge Boyce Martin papers, a collection of more than 700 boxes that is only partially open and encompasses a partnership with the university’s law school. The presenters will share lessons learned and provide practical approaches to managing judicial collections, including issues related to donor restrictions, privacy and confidentiality concerns, and appraisal decisions.

Digging Beneath the Topsoil: Sharing Stories of Diversity in Predominantly White Institutional Records

How can we uncover the diverse voices in our collections? In archives at predominantly white institutions, our inherited collections often only record history through the lens of white administrations. However, within these collections we can “dig beneath the topsoil” for records that showcase the wide, diverse communities that are an integral part of our institutions. In this session, the presenters will discuss projects in which they dug beneath the surface to find stories of people historically underrepresented in their collections and methods you can use at your own repositories.

Sarah Bush will talk about an exhibit she curated on the process of desegregation at Washington University School of Medicine and how to work with what you have to make an exhibit on voices underrepresented in your repository. Jo Otremba will share about their search for records on segregated student teaching practices at Indiana University Bloomington and the archivist’s responsibility to disrupt “colorblind collections.” Jenna Stout will share how administrative records were redescribed and utilized for a centennial celebration of the Saint Louis Art Museum’s Education Department. This type of large-scale processing initiative can illuminate diverse stories and identify collecting gaps in museum institutional recordkeeping.

Speakers: Jo Otremba, Indiana University Bloomington (session chair)
Sarah Bush, Bernard Becker Medical Library, Washington University School of Medicine
Jenna Stout, Saint Louis Art Museum

Good Things Come in Threes: Building a Digital Collection at the University of Minnesota

One of the many impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic has been an increased focus on digital collections. Join the presenters as they discuss digital collections development and relationship-building at the University of Minnesota Libraries. How does an increased focus on digital collections encourage us to reevaluate and reprioritize our decision-making in our areas of expertise? What does it mean to work collaboratively to build a digital collection in this new pandemic-driven era? Using the John Berryman papers as the collection of focus, this session will feature presentations from three staff members representing three different departments at UMN Libraries, all of whom are active contributors to the libraries’ digital collections site, UMedia. First, the head of Digital Library Services, Theresa Berger, will discuss the digitization planning, metadata creation, and front-end decision-making that goes into creating a digital collection, with an eye on strategies for inclusive metadata and user-informed front-end design. Next, the web applications developer, Scott Lawan, will discuss the “back-end,” technical side of things and the importance of sustainable code that can be changed over time and that incorporates web accessibility. Finally, the interim curator for the Upper Midwest Literary Archives, Erin McBrien, will discuss ways in which low-barrier processing and reprocessing decisions can be made to better support digitization and digital collections development. Throughout, the presenters will highlight ways in which cross-departmental communication and collaboration have contributed to breaking down traditional academic silos and helped promote a more widely accessible digital platform for all.

Constrcuting Community: How Shared Historic Preservation Interests Build Better Places and Spaces

Generating interest in local history and historic buildings can be a challenge at times for archivists and historic preservationists. When the two groups collaborate, however, it can lead to greater interest and investment in preservation across the board. This session will explore how partnerships between historic preservationists and archivists can increase community relationships, foster greater interest in local histories, and further work to preserve a community's documentary and architectural heritage. Tricia Gilson will discuss a multipartner effort to document a nineteenth-century historic downtown and some of the women-owned and Jewish-owned businesses once found there. Sara DeCaro will describe her experience writing a successful nomination for her state's register of historic places and how that effort led to stronger community relationships. Hayley Jackson will discuss how tracking down records of a local Iowa architect led to a multiyear collaboration that built community relationships, gathered important architectural records for preservation, and increased community interest in his architectural legacy. Tyson Koenig and Hannah Houston will discuss supporting student work and building connections with archives in the context of preservation education at a university with one of the nation's only undergraduate historic preservation programs, where the ties between archival and historic preservation work are strong and mutually beneficial.

Community Outreach, Community Input: The Milwaukee Women’s Art Library Ambassador Experiment

In 2021, the Archives Department at the University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee Libraries (UWM) acquired a small collection of the papers of women and nonbinary artists, with a special focus on artists of color, called the Milwaukee Women’s Art Library (MWAL). It was intended to document parts of the local arts scene that are underrepresented in the city’s repositories. The following year, UWM secured grant funding from the Digital Public Library of America through its Mellon-funded Digital Equity Fund to help diversify the country’s digital historical record holdings, which it used to hire a community ambassador to work with the MWAL collection through fall 2023. The position would be held by a practicing local artist with deep connections in the local arts scene—not an archivist—who would be charged with conducting outreach in that community to “plant the seeds” of the historical value of artists’ papers and the need to preserve them, whether at UWM, at another local repository or community archives, or by artists keeping their own personal archives. After learning about the MWAL collection and archival appraisal practices, and then spending most of the year engaged in local outreach, the community ambassador would then join the archives in reviewing its collecting policy, deed of gift, and other policy infrastructure as a representative of the local arts community considering their own concerns and those of the many other artists they had spoken with. In this session, the MWAL community ambassador and representatives from the UWM Libraries will discuss the project’s structure, progress, and impact, and will then address your questions.

Environmental Stewardship: Managing the Process of Changing Archival Spaces

A building renovation in many ways is comparable to that of sowing and harvesting a garden. It requires a favorable environment, great planning, patience, and fortitude. Both the process and outcome can be wildly unpredictable, so archivists and any other parties involved must be prepared to respond with flexibility, adaptability, and, at times, compromise.

When we think about renovations, how do we as practitioners and leaders advocate for the specialized requirements that suit the needs of our evolving collections? How do we balance asking for what we want versus what is minimally required? What sacrifices may be needed to satisfy external administrators whose priorities differ from those of us practicing in the profession? Decisions made—and perhaps not made—have lasting effects on our ability to care for and steward our collections.

Four archivists from various institutions will discuss, compare, and contrast their renovation experiences from initial designs and proposals to completion. They will detail steps that were required to prepare for their projects, how they adapted to challenging circumstances along the way, and the desired versus the actual outcomes. The objectives of this presentation will be to share their lessons learned—what went well and what didn’t—and to allow a robust question-and-answer session following their presentations. This session seeks to provide real-life and actionable information that you can use to help with any possible future renovation plans at your own institution.

- Jenny Haddon, University of Nebraska at Kearney (session chair)

Learning from Failure in Education and Outreach

Conference sessions often highlight archivists’ successes as opposed to failures and lessons learned. This session discusses the latter in education and outreach initiatives. Matt Gorzalski guest lectured two classes in an in-person course for history majors in spring 2022. He modified his instruction for fall 2022 when the course was offered online and asynchronously. These efforts were met with crickets, and a semester’s worth of research was wasted. The experience taught lessons in setting expectations with the instructor and better approaches concerning asynchronous courses.

The Upper Peninsula Digital Network is an access and preservation consortium established in 2021 by a two-year NHPRC implementation grant. During the first summer, Annika Peterson presented workshops that combined a pitch to potential members with a training session about the process and costs of participation. They were, to put it mildly, a complete dumpster fire, but they also taught her many valuable lessons about structuring presentations, about working with people of different ages/communication styles, and about the importance of pilot projects.

The Michigan Tech Archives is a cosponsor of a once-successful Michigan History Day contest. After the pandemic, previous approaches to engage teachers and support students have fallen flat. Lindsay Hiltunen will discuss lessons learned to revitalize the program. Challenges explored will include strategies for working with teachers, students, and public schools in widespread rural communities and tribal lands.

- Matt Gorzalski, Southern Illinois University Carbondale (session chair)

Incoming! Changes to Archival Accessioning

There has been a rise of accessioning job postings and literature in the field recently, with publication of "Archival Accessioning" and IMLS-funded work to create a best practices for accessioning. This session will hear from three institutions that have recently implemented a new accessioning program and/or recently hired an accessioning archivist for the first time, with perspectives shared from both the supervisor of accessioning work and the archivist in the accessioning role. Lessons learned, recommendations for integrating an accessioning archivist into existing workflows, and roadblocks will all be shared. Additionally, the presenters aim to address:

- How are processing and accessioning related/separate?
- How does a processing foundation influence accessioning work, and how can that base be used in onboarding/training?
- What skills can accessioning archivists take into their next role, and what exactly is career progression for an accessioning archivist?
- How are legacy issues being addressed when there is a new approach to creating accession information and gathering data about collections that especially seeks to highlight historically underrepresented voices?
- What should institutions of various sizes/staffing structures take away from this "trend" in larger academic archives?

The 1980s Farm Crisis in Iowa: Documentary Sources and Stories

The 1980s Farm Crisis in Iowa devastated rural communities and rural families, with a collapsed economy and farmers forced from their land. As described in Iowa State University Distinguished Professor of History Pamela Riney-Kehrberg’s new book, When a Dream Dies: Agriculture, Iowa, and the Farm Crisis of the 1980s, rural life in Iowa was completely disrupted. The Iowa Farm Crisis has been documented in a variety of resources and repositories throughout Iowa including oral histories, organizational records, and materials that also document activism, the growing role of women, gender roles, and the impact on marginalized communities throughout the state and the Midwest.

Presenters will share about their collections and research projects for this traumatic decade and what it might mean for archivists. Amy Bishop will highlight a selection of Farm Crisis–related collections held by Iowa State University, tracing connections among organizations actively responding to the economic and social catastrophe and the personal histories documented in oral histories. Andrew Klumpp will discuss recent public history collaborations led by the Annals of Iowa that highlighted a new oral history initiative with ambassador to China and former Iowa governor Terry Branstad, an academic roundtable on Pamela Riney-Kehrberg’s book When a Dream Dies, and resources for teaching K–12 students about the Farm Crisis of the 1980s. Nicole Saylor will discuss her personal research project that looks at how the Farm Crisis continues to impact the people who grew up during it. She will highlight the archival resources, including personal narratives, that are informing her project. Dr. Pamela Riney-Kehrberg will provide commentary.

Speakers:
- Tanya Zanish-Belcher, Wake Forest University (session chair)
- Amy Bishop, Iowa State University

Unearthing Women’s Contributions in Archival Collections

Women’s work and influence are often thought to be undercollected in institutions. Archivists often know this is not the case, that the women’s work is there, it sometimes just needs to be brought to the surface. This panel looks at ways in which we can both cultivate women and their work by publicizing the collections in programs, libguides, and research works, and reexamine past procedures. A second look at a collection’s arrangement itself can often reframe our knowledge and understanding of the materials already in our collections. One presenter will look at the role women’s religious congregations have played in the establishment and growth of schools and hospitals throughout this country. Looking at the records of the Sisters of St. Agnes gives insight into the breadth of their influence in the fields of education and health care that is often overlooked. The second presenter will provide a broader look at some of the women in American Heritage Center collections and how they are significant but their contributions to their professions are often overlooked because of their gender. She will consider how sometimes their records are included in collections but are harder to find if they aren’t the “name” or “organization” of emphasis in the collection. The third presenter will look at the work of one woman, UW’s first librarian, Grace Raymond Hebard, to illustrate the significant work women did at colleges around the country. The last presenter will consider the more practical side of how we can open up collections or reveal these collections/books by looking at existing collection orders and then reorganizing or rewriting collection inventories to bring the women to the forefront.

Empowering Educators: Nurturing Faculty Comfort with Primary Source Instruction through Innovative Outreach and Learning Communities

Teaching students to use primary sources and develop primary source literacy can be challenging: primary sources may not be available locally or on a given topic, students may need training and support to find and use sources, and technology may make potential sources unavailable or unreliable. Faculty, who often have no formal training in how to find and incorporate primary source materials in the classroom, are often stymied as much as their students in finding and utilizing primary sources in their own research, not to mention integrating them into classroom instruction and assignments.

Recognizing this challenge, librarians and archivists may choose to actively engage with faculty to provide professional development opportunities with the goal of empowering educators to make the most of primary source materials in their teaching and research. You will learn from two distinct case examples—one from Bowling Green State University (BGSU) demonstrating the creation of a multisession learning community for faculty and graduate students, and the other from Butler Community College demonstrating the development of standalone 50-minute workshops. Whether you’re ready to implement a learning community or hoping to start with one-shot opportunities for faculty, this session will provide practical tips and advice for cultivating empowered educators who are better prepared to incorporate primary sources in their classrooms.

Stefanie Hunker, Bowling Green State University
Michelle Sweetser, Bowling Green State University

Cultivating Your Archival Garden: Digging into Data for Assessment and Programmatic Improvement

Archivists are gathering more data than ever, whether that be metadata, processing metrics, or collection-use data. However, it takes time and effort to use these data to assess and inform our current work. This session aims to present three case studies that examine data-driven approaches to archival functions. Megan Mummey will discuss using collection-use data to analyze research trends, set processing priorities, and determine collections in need of reprocessing or redescription. Hannah Pryor will present on using data on past record transfers to identify collection gaps and plan outreach strategies to build the university archives. Morgen MacIntosh Hodgetts will report on her collection-wide survey using the assessment module in ArchivesSpace, which she plans to use to inform future collection management projects, the prioritization of reprocessing and redescription, and the revision of the collection development policy. To build off the saying “One must cultivate one’s own garden,” this session posits that to cultivate our “archival gardens,” we must use data to improve and inform our work, whether that be in assessing description, prioritizing collections for processing, or identifying collection gaps.

Finding Aids for Finding Collections: Using New Description to Intellectually Reunite Traditionally Split Collections

Acknowledging that existing collection management practices and policies are no longer adequate takes courage. Acting on this takes time and patience. This can be especially true when tradition and inertia maintain a status quo that does not serve the interests of the collections or users. This session will explore examples of description and access practices that initiated changes to these situations. Presenters will share case studies of decisions to provide access to split collections, tools used for description and access, and how each experience and situation considers past or current donor relations, collection development decisions or practices, joint or separate research access points, and past and current user needs. You will leave with practical approaches to description and access for physically and/or administratively siloed portions of intellectually similar collections, as well as an understanding of how archival description can be used to bridge those silos in varying management contexts.

Treshani Perera and Ruth Bryan will discuss their approach to unifying University of Kentucky School of Music concert recordings and programs housed in the University Archives and the Fine Arts Library. They will cover collection acquisition and description decisions, including their decision to create an archival collection guide and a collection-level MARC record providing two access pathways to this dispersed collection. Lindy Smith and Derek Long will discuss their work at the University of Missouri–Kansas City to combine multiple finding aids for split collections as part of an ArchivesSpace implementation. With this shift, access is more straightforward for patrons, but it has necessitated new workflows for staff.
